

Is Coronavirus fear disconnecting your workforce?

Achieve a Higher level of Employee Engagement with Creative Social Intranet- The outbreak of Coronavirus has led to a slowdown of various giant organisations and their routine operations. As the coronavirus epidemic widens, Public health officials have recommended corporates to allow people to work from home.

Although the COVID-19 coronavirus causes flu-like symptoms, it's not a flu virus. The fact that there is no vaccine or antiviral treatment currently available to fight the disease and so people have to rely on more basic strategies to reduce the risk of the infection. Those strategies include avoiding opportunities for the virus to spread through direct contact with people who have an infection.

As the outbreak of the virus has vulnerable effects in various countries, Disease Control and Prevention Centres are also urging to have strategies ready to protect the workforce and their operations. It should be ensured that everyone has the necessary tools to work from home and have outside-of-work contact information on hand. Many companies have mentioned the deep cleaning of office spaces and self-quarantining. Face to face job interviews have been banned by some firms, in favour, interviews were conducted by teleconference.
